Internet addiction or IAD is one of the newest terms to enter the med-ical lexicon. It may sound strange or even amusing to many, but psychologists are finding it an increasingly real problem among younger generations. IAD can mostly be seen among young people aged between 14 and30 years old. It displays all of the typical addiction-related problems like loss of control, lack of rational thinking and uncontrollable cravings, just like those experienced by any addict hooked on drugs, alcohol or junk food. Those with IAD may suffer disastrous consequences. Many students who spend hundreds of hours on Internet interactions may fail exams simply because they neglect their studies. Then there are those who are so hooked on the Internet that they fail to make new friends among fellows tudents. Many adults with IAD have been unable to concentrate on their work and some of them have even lost their jobs.
