章节摘录

版权页：插图：On the evening of April 16, CERING TANDRUP went to Xining, the capital city of Qinghai, with his injured grandmother and mother by the rescue plane for further medical treatment. His grandmother was placed in the Qinghai Traffic Hospital, and his mother was sent to another hospital in Xining, so the ten-year-old CERING TANDRUP became the only relative to stay with his grandmother. In the Qinghai Traffic Hospital, CERING TANDRUP still remembered that he was a volunteer and interpreted actively for the injured, their family members, and the doctors and nurses. He still kept saying, "Where does it hurt?" "Don't you feel well?" "Are you feeling better now?" These simple words conveyed the concerns of PLA soldiers, doctors, and nurses as well as the concerns of all the fellow countrymen to the Tibetans who had suffered so much loss. By that time, other regions of the country had prepared to treat those injured in the earthquake. Hospitals in Gansu, Shaanxi, and Sichuan provinces accepted hundreds of injured people, and Xining became the treatment center for the critically injured. Since doctors in these hospitals knew little about the habits of Tibetan people, they asked in detail about Tibetans' eating habits, and each day they planned the menu accordingly. Some medical staff even went to nearby Tibetan areas to purchase food for them because Tibetan people do not eat pork or fish but prefer yak meat instead. So steamed stuffed buns and noodles with yak meat became the main staple for these patients. Whether in Yushu or Xining, CERING TANDRUP was a popular volunteer. Doctor CUI Liping in the Department of Orthopedics of the Qinghai Traffic Hospital said, "He was clever and smart, and spoke Chinese very well. Everyone liked him." CERING TANDRUP could feel the deep affection the doctors and rescuers had for him and for the quake victims. He conveyed this affection to the Tibetan patients by translating into Tibetan simple questions like "Where does it hurt?" "Do you feel good?" "Feeling better yet?"
