章节摘录

时文点击 Global Warming Is Turning "Roof of the World" into Desert Global warming is rapidly melting the ice-capped roof of the world , and turning it into desert. The glaciers of the Tibetan plateau are vanishing so fast that they will be reduced by 50% every decade. The vast environmental changes brought about will increase droughts and sandstorms over the rest of the country , and dry many of the world's greatest rivers , in what experts warn will be an "ecological catastrophe". The plateau has 46 , 298 glaciers , covering almost 60 , 000 square miles , which feed several of the major rivers in China and Southeast Asia. They make up the largest area of ice outside the polar regions , nearly a sixth of the world's total. However , in the past 100 years , the area of these glaciers has shrunk by 30%. Water losses because of global warming and vaporization have reduced water volume in the earth in this region and the grassland is drying out. The rising temperatures are also endangering the newly built world's highest railway. They threaten to melt the permafrost under the tracks of the Tibetan railway , constructed to link the area with China's northwestern Qinghai province. Perhaps worst of all , the melting threatens to cut off water supplies over much of Asia. Many of the continent's greatest rivers--including the Yangtze , the Yellow River , the Indus , the Ganges , the Brahmaputra , and the Mekong--rise on the plateau. In China alone , 300 million people depend on water from the glaciers for their survival. So scientists are strongly calling on countries to use all tools available to reduce dangerous emissions of greenhouse gases.
