内容概要

The proliferation of international institutions and their impact has become a central issue in international relations。 Why do countries comply with international agreements and how do international institutions influence national policies ? Most theories focus on the extent to which international institutions can wield ' carrots and sticks ' directly in their relations with states。 Xinyuan Dai presents an alternative framework in which they influence national policies indirectly by utilizing non-state actors (NGOs , social movements) and empowering domestic constituencies。 In this way , even weak international institutions that lack ' carrots and sticks ' may have powerful effects on states。 Supported by empirical studies of environmental politics , human rights and economic and security issues , this book sheds fresh light on how and why international institutions matter。 It will be of interest to students , scholars and policymakers in both international relations and international law。
