前言

In September 2008, the world economy plunged into the severest financial crisis ever since the Great Depression. The crisis is unprecedentedly shocking in terms of its size, extent and scope. Surely, Chinese economy mainly weighed down by reduction in demand, overcapacity, some struggling companies and industries, a sharp rise in the unemployed and the slack economic growth was not exempted from the impact. The Chinese government took decisive action just in time to adjust the macro-economic policies featuring expanding the internal demand particularly consumption demand so as to strike a balance between speed and structure, quality and efficiency. A package of policies, stimulated by the government control and the market, were implemented and constantly refined in the hope that relationship between the economic growth and well-being of the people would be promoted. As a result, the economic downturn was drastically reversed. China is a responsible country, making its due contribution to recovery of the global economy.

In the past decades, it is well understood that amanager's qualification plays a vital role in crisis management. There is no doubt that the Chinese managers are going professional. Nevertheless, those middle and senior managers in a large number of companiesin China are not truly experienced in doing business in the international market. With the globalization, the Chinese market is opening up and getting morecomplicated. In comparison with the overseas counterparts, the Chinesemanagers are inexperienced. How to enhance their ability to be aware of and todeal with crises guided by theories related to crisis management remains a issuewhich requires immediate attention. In this open market, professional managers are provided with a unified, openplatform. Affected by the global financial turmoil, the managers find themselvesunder stress, due to differences in background, mechanism, managementapproaches. It naturally follows that the Chinese professional managers musthave the following five qualifications. They are wisdom, which comes from learning; unity, which arises fromcharacter; creativity stemming from practice; leadership based on personality andinfluence rooted in achievement. Besides, Chinese managers should be ambitious, honest, confident,persistent and benevolent. More importantly, the managers keep another ten "don' ts" in mind. Theyshan't make no changes. They shan't be aimless. They shan't amount tonothing. They shan't be obstinate. They shan't be indecisive. They shan't beshortsighted. They shan't be conceited. They shan't make no progress. Finally,they shan't take too much risk.
