章节摘录

Computers can help many workers. They can also help thieves. There was one thief who worked in a United States bank. He paid for everything he needed by check. Then he told the computer not to take any money from his account for the checks he wrote. The banks computer did what he said. It gave the shops money for his checks, but it did not take any money from his bank account. One day the computer broke down. People had to do the computers work. They soon found out what was happening. Another thief who worked for a bank saw people filling in deposit forms. Many of these people did not know their account numbers, so they wrote only their names on the forms. They left empty the place for their account numbers. The thief wrote down his own account number in this place. When the computer read these forms it looked only at the account numbers. It did not look at the customers names. It paid the money on these deposit forms into the thiefs account. Then there was the bank worker who told the bank computer to take ten cents off every customers account each month and put it into his own account. For a long time the banks customers did not notice that they were losing ten cents every month. But then someone did notice and told the bank. That was the end of that little game ! No one really knows how much computer crime is costing the banks, but some people believe it is millions of dollars a year.
