章节摘录

were brief. Standing to my left was Richard. He was tall and lanky , with dark hair and heavy black-rimmed glasses. Next to him stood a shorter man with blond hair. His name was Simon , and he looked nervously at the stainless steel covers. Fern was the other woman in the group. It was clear she was straight out of college. She shyly twisted her auburn hair around her Index finger. Eric stood to my right. He was tall , blond and strikingly handsome , and he wore a look of supreme confidence as he leafed through his anatomy text , underlining sentences. Dr. Parsons walked briskly over to our table. I watched his hands as they grasped the two steel handles. I held my breath. The covers slid down with an earsplitting slam. My most vivid memory of that instant was the smell. The fumes from the formaldehyde , in which the body had been soaked , seared my eyes as well as my nostrils. All five of us reeled backward from this unexpected assault to our senses. Then we looked at the body. I tried to avert my eyes from the face , and stared instead at the torso of a thin , frail female in her late sixties. Her skin was grayish tan. It had an unusual quality about it , almost as if by being preserved in a strong chemical it had been drained of the color , odor and texture of life. The bloodless cadaver could not have weighed more than eighty-five pounds. I tried not to think of the body before me as a person. I tried not to imagine how she had died and whom she had left behind. I told myself , as I gripped the side of the table , that she was made of plastic or modeling clay , and I repeated again and again. Its not real , its not real. Richard was the first to pick up his scalpel. Dr. Parsons had just begun to give the directions. We were to start with a dissection of the neck to the breast. Before any of us could stop him , Richard was clumsily slashing away at the grayish skin. Fern and Simon instinctively moved back from the table. It was Eric who moved forward and took command. He immediately christened Richard with a name that would last all term : the Slasher. Eric warned Richard to slow down and wait for further directions. We all knew how important it was not to destroy the tiny and delicate nerves and veins we were supposed to uncover and learn to recognize.
