章节摘录

It is not wise for a young man to expect only to be rich , nor is it good for him to direct his attention solely to power and fame. The mark that is set before every young man to aim at is this——Be Somebody. A young man who expects to be somebody often turns out to be one. The story told of Disraeli is illustrative of the case. On entering public life , Disraeli aspired to be both scholar and orator. He succeeded better in his literary work than in his oratorical efforts. He was at first a total failure as a public speaker. However , he felt sure that he could overcome every obstacle , and devoted himself with invincible purpose to the task. Some of his friends thought he was foolish and even cranky. But he stuck to his purpose , and finally accomplished it. He became one of the ripest scholars and most eloquent public speakers that Great Britain has ever produced.
