章节摘录

An unremarked consequence of our new information age-one that will influence readers , writers , and publishers in the future-is that bad writing , chat speaking , text , millions of message board posts that come from and lead nowhere , are having a cheapening effect on all written content. As a veteran journalist has pointed out: "Editors and news directors today fret about the Internet as their predecessors worried about radio and TV , and all now see the huge threat the Web represents to the way they distribute their product. They have been slower to see the threat it represents to the product itself. In a day when information pours out of digital spigots , stories that package painstakingly gathered facts on current events-what happened , who said what , when-have lost much of their value. " The idea that the practice and craft of writing can simply retool itself for the digital age overlooks the fact that the Web is giving rise to totally unique forms of expression , a writing that is different from the kind traditionally found in books. You-Tube clips , animations , and other video applications account for more than 60% of Internet traffic today. The proportion is growing rapidly. For lovers of literary writing , who are now watching the marketplace and Internet erode the remains of 19th century print culture , these assurances may not be particularly consoling. We have no choice but to accept them. Arguing against the forces of digitalization is as much a losing battle as cursing the coming of the evening tide. But before we invest ourselves too deeply in this future , consider this: If new technologies expose the biases inherent in print and text , so the converse is true as well; that the written word is uniquely suitable for revealing the myopias of our digital age. If poor old Oliver Goldsmith were alive today , he might argue that critical reading abilities , cultural literacy , and traditional literacy were never more vital than the present. Coding skills are highly marketable in the 21st century. We , as writers of the new century , are duty-bound to encourage technological know-how. However , before we make the mistake of convincing ourselves that a knack for writing software is more valuable than the ability to simply write well , we might consider looking anew at the souvenir that is the book. One day , computer programs-these objects of our fascination and frustration-will learn to write themselves. And we'll be left with our ideas , however grand or shallow.

English subordinate clauses are classified into six groups , i. e. subject clauses , object clauses , predicative clauses , appositive clauses , attributive clauses , and adverbial clauses. Since the first four of them function as nouns in a complex sentence , they are generally called nominal clauses. And here are some nominal clauses from the above Practice of the Relevant Skill:

An unremarked consequence of our new information age-one that will influence readers , writers , and publishers in the future-is that bad writing , chat speaking , text , millions of message board posts that come from and lead nowhere , are having a cheapening effect on all written content.新信息时代有一个不太引人注意的后果,那就是文字都很蹩脚。无论是写作、闲聊、短信、还是留言板上不计其数的跟帖,都来无踪去无影,使文字内容大打折扣,对未来的读者、作者和编辑将产生很大影响。 .....
